"Zilla Jr."

What was produced couldn't possibly be what was intended.

LED lights mounted to toddler's shoes seems like a fun idea. Parents can purchase bright little shoes to match the joy of their tiny tykes, with the full expectation that onlookers will observe and say, "Isn't that cute?" Their children could move about like human disco balls, dancing to the tune of their happiness and inviting everyone around to join them. It's a wonderful vision.

That's not how it works.

"BAM! BAM! BAM! BAM!" Noise cancelling headphones were no match for the toddler coming through the coffee house doors. The metal transition strip between the outside world and room acted as an additionally loud herald for his arrival. The young boy was leaning to his left, looking down, trying to see how hard he needed to strike the ground to get the lights on his shoes to flash. It appeared that it took his entire body weight thrown into every violent step. He looked like Godzilla angrily attempting to trample an ant-sized Japanese town.

"BAM! BAM! BAM! BAM!" His mother became aware of people sitting at tables, attempting to work and study. She got into line, no doubt praying that her battery life would be artificially extended longer than the ones powering her son's shoes. As she did, she looked down and said, "Let's try to be quiet. O.k., honey?" Mesmerized by the lights, it was as if the mother never spoke.

He was so focused on his shoes that he walked directly into a nearby chair. Momentarily stunned, his resolve remained. The entire time his mother stood in line, this kid marched around the room with one goal- make light happen. The disappointment in his face when his shoes didn't flash was always followed by a more determined look, followed by an aggressive step. I wondered if his mother wanted him to simply stomp away into the night, but with those lights on his shoes, the authorities would never accept that she accidentally lost him.

"To go" was the only option for this poor mother's order. As she exited he stomped his way over the transition strip one last time before leaving the rest of the room in peace.

Bringing the "light," or joy to others almost always takes significant effort. It demands putting one foot in front of the other, even when each step may be hard. More importantly, it often requires consideration for where others are in life.

Believers have a vision of what brings light and joy to others. Many want to share it. It's like inviting others to join the Christian dance. That's the right mindset. The more the dance involves God, Jesus and the Holy Spirit, the more beautiful it is.

However, the Christian also must truly desire to fill the need of others with what is good after assessing what those needs are. In that sense, they're joining others in their dance. Paul writes that we are to "rejoice with those who rejoice and weep with those who weep." The idea is not that we simply act as chameleons with every new passerby. It's that we get into the trenches with others where they're really at. We get into life with them in a personal way because we truly care and desire to help them where they are. That need may be spiritual, emotional, physical, or the need for truth. If we don't try to understand the real needs of others in an effort to help fill them, we may be unwittingly inviting them into a dance that they perceive is made of nothing more than noise, made for our own delight.
